

Australian Poetry Members Anthology

Volume 3
2014

Australian Poetry

Members Anthology

Volume 3
2014

Publishing Information
Members Anthology 2014

2014 Volume 3
australianpoetry.org
A publication of Australian Poetry Ltd

Editors: Lucy Dougan and Martin Langford Designer: Stuart Geddes Publications Manager: Bronwyn Lovell Editorial Assistants: Jessica Hirst & Grace Lovell

Australian Poetry is the peak industry body for poetry in Australia, with a charter to promote and support Australian poets and poetry locally, regionally, nationally, and internationally.

Australian Poetry Members Anthology is published annually. Address editorial correspondence to Level 3 The Wheeler Centre, Little Lonsdale Street, Melbourne, Victoria 3000 or by email to programs@australianpoetry.org

Australian Poetry Ltd attains worldwide first publication rights in both printed and digital form for the distribution and promotion of the Australian Poetry Members Anthology as a whole.

Copyright 2014 by Australian Poetry Ltd.

ISSN 2204-3616

Individual copies of the anthology (including back issues) can be purchased directly from Australian Poetry Ltd., or in independent bookstores nationally.

Cover image

Jo Bertini, Sandhill Series—Honey Grevillia and Spider Flowers, 2012, oil on canvas 92 × 84cm

Support

Australian Government

ARTS VICTORIA

M CITY OF MELBOURNE

Government of South Australia

MELBOURNE

CITY OF LITERATURE

The Feast of Identity

Lucy Dougan and Martin Langford

In her poem, “Rubbish Removal Day”, Susan Adams writes: “After each stripping/there is a feast/to adorn myself/ with identity. . .” Writing poetry can be like that. There is, of course, the element of getting something out of one’s system, of needing, in some atavistic, or obsessive way, to “express” something: to make it visible, or external. But there is also the nature of the process itself: so often, there is a period of dislocation, of dissatisfaction with the bits and pieces in front of one, which will remain, sometimes for a frustratingly long time, until the poem takes on enough shape for one to be released from its imperfections. At that stage, if it is good enough, it will assume an identity of its own. Of all the language that humans create, nothing is as distinctive as a good poem: nothing else stands out so sharply from the welter of the vague and the incomplete. Not only, however, does the poem itself take on an identity, it becomes part of the identity of the author: a component, in turn, of his or her story. It was with these thoughts in mind that we selected the title, “The Feast of Identity”. And because that is what an anthology is: a kind of banquet, where the reader can savour the words with which others have articulated their experiences.

The anthology contains a mix of established and less well-known poets, and displays the wide range of styles one has come to expect from contemporary poets. It is, among other things, a snapshot of the high level of skill possessed by the poets in Australian Poetry. The editors were particularly struck by the level of trust the poets displayed in the emotional nature of their material. As it is, both editors share a belief that poetry—or any art—which disowns emotion is either lacking or diminished, or better defined as something altogether different—philosophy, perhaps, or cultural dialogue. We agree with Andrew Motion when he says that he “never quite believe(s) it when poets say that they’re not writing out of their own feelings, and when that is the case, (that he) is not terribly interested in what they are doing.” This was, however, not an issue with which we had to deal. If one way of defining the lyric is to say it is a poem that is capable of musicality because its meanings are inflected emotionally, then the poems we were asked to consider were overwhelmingly lyrics. This is not the place to argue the lyric’s validity or otherwise, but on the evidence of the submissions to this anthology, the lyric tradition is robust.

We would like to thank the publications officer at AP, Bronwyn Lovell, for her energy and expertise in the management of this project. We would also like to thank all the contributors, successful or otherwise: it has been a pleasure and a privilege to work with your material: a members’ anthology provides an idiosyncratic and surprising survey of the quality of work sourced from a single organisation.

Contents

6	Susan Adams	Rubbish Removal Day
7	David Ades	The Last Obstacle Finally Overcome
8	Kaye Aldenhoven	Five memories from the end of a life
11	Kaye Aldenhoven	After a year
12	Richard Allen	Kokoda
13	John Bennett	Dusk Deep Creek
14	Margaret Bradstock	William Hodges
15	Lisa Brockwell	Earth Girls Are Easy
16	Lisa Brockwell	Waiting for the Train
17	Jennifer Compton	Like In A Movie
18	Brett Dionysius	Forty-five 20	Anne Elvey	Treasure Hunt
21	Diane Fahey	Heatwave
22	Angela Gardner	Space Faring
23	Ian Gibbins	Bayside Reporter
24	Kevin Gillam	chamber musing
26	Ron Heard	Hedges
27	Siobhan Hodge	After Labé
28	John Jenkins	When he read the poem in the room above the stairs
30	Helga Jermy	Saaremaa
31	Barbara Kamler	A love letter to my mother-in-law 32	Joan Kerr	3 poems
33	Christopher Konrad	Clock
34	Bronwyn Lang	Untitled Prose Poem
35	Ray Liversidge	Mindfulness
36	Mark Liston	Three Haiku
37	Rose Lucas	Under the Wave 38	Rose Lucas	Unexpected Fall
39	Robert Lumsden	Not-Birds
40	Earl Livings	Naming Instinct
41	Julie Maclean	Ventenac Nightingale and the Bereaved
42	Mark Mahemoff	A new premises

43	Colin Montfort	Happenstance
44	Philip Neilsen	Men of a Certain Age
45	Norm Neill	dominion
46	Kerrie Nelson	Memento Mori
48	Mark O'Flynn	Hit Dog
50	Patricia O'Heare	A Pip, a Secret and a Lucky Coin
51	Patricia O'Heare	The City of Lost Animals
52	Uyen Nguyen	Mary-An Jane
53	Tony Page	My Brother Cannot Sleep
54	Jeremy Page	Go, But Take These Maps
56	Vanessa Page	Signs of life
57	Janette Pieloor	Before
58	Robyn Rowland	Poppy Picking
60	Christopher Race	It is Quite Difficult
61	Ian Smith	The Seduction of Maps
62	Pam Schindler	Man sleeping
63	Pam Schindler	Rain
64	Laura Shore	What I want to know
66	Alex Skovron	The Glovebox Dispensary
67	Alex Skovron	Zugswang
68	Patricia Sykes	En Route
69	Gillian Telford	a weight of hair
70	John Upton	4711
71	Rose van Son	Almost Blind
72	Rob Walker	a clarity of smog 73	Rob Walker	yama reflecting
74	James Walton	Autumn Break
75	Jen Webb	For a painting in a rented beach house
76	Matt Wills	Driving Home
77	Jena Woodhouse	Why I am loath to discard glass
78	Kimberley Zeneth	Stepmother Country
80	Contributors

Susan Adams
Rubbish Removal Day

Twice a year I put myself out on the street beaten by the hits of god faded by the planets rained upon.

Discarded pieces kick at their life.
When the truck removes this shedding my footprints are lighter.
I shrink with this outage the trust of begone.

After each stripping there is a feast to adorn myself with identity, possessions become my persona.
Heavy again with accumulated need there will be another pruning later in the year.

Plain has a fear of exposure we are frail without the clutter, the busyness of own and display hides bones shaved by doubt and wear.
These cloaks hang over our mirrors.

David Ades

The Last Obstacle Finally Overcome

Here, high up the slopes of that last mountain, that mountain rising beyond deep blue into black, where the air is thin and getting thinner, you need to pause every few moments for breath.

How many times have you watched this unfold from below? Now it is your turn, come so soon though not suddenly, and others are watching.
A breath and another breath: life's little summations.

It is about breath now, nothing else.
You have made your farewells, quietly as is your way, so quietly they have yet to be noticed. All the old arguments are finished, all the opinions, all the stances.

Rasping, keeping departure at bay just a little longer, you summon the gathered patience of decades and wait for a moment, the perfect moment when the room is at last empty, the perturbed air at last still, the audience departed: the audience for whom you save your final courtesy.

Kaye Aldenhoven

Five memories from the end of a life

1 They don't even know who I am

The Ward Manager phoned: Bring Brett at 2pm, we will be ready to admit him.

We arrived at 2pm, but they were not ready.

At 3pm I must leave to collect the boys from school.

I thought he'd be safe.

We had struggled to get Brett admitted to hospital.

He had struggled for months, coming home from 5 hours in Emergency Department with a pair of panadol and a warning:

Don't waste my valuable time.

Two panadol for advanced cancer stomach?

I thought my son was safe curled up in the big chair

I'd pushed into the room they said he would occupy when a spare bed was found. When I returned Brett was still in the big chair but in another room.

A nurse bent over his wrist, cutting off his identification tag with her scissors.

Don't leave me here Mum, he cried tearfully.

Don't leave me, Mum.

They don't even know who I am.

An orderly had woken him, tried to take him to Tiwi Gardens Nursing Home, at first gently, then forcefully. Brett had protested:

I am not Anderson, I am Aldenhoven.

He physically resisted his kidnapper. When the orderly, attempting to discharge his orders, sought assistance, the error was discovered, but not admitted, never admitted.

When kindly Dr Rob asked Brett how he was a short time later, Brett said:

Monty Python's Flying Circus continues.

2 Red Jelly

How hard can it be to give me red jelly?

Only green, the anxious Filipina explains, Handing him a tray with egg and lettuce sandwiches (can't eat them) an orange (can't eat it) cold custard with canned peach slices (can't eat them)

I reconnoitre the trolley shelves in another ward Thieve red jelly Return with my loot

In his journal my starving son wrote:

*'Three spoons of red jelly And a cup of green tea.
That's all.'*

3 I knew he would like yellow jelly a glance at the old black dog was all I needed to be sure he would like yellow jelly, left-over yellow jelly that Brett could not eat yellow jelly that could not pass down blocked by stomach cancer.

a sweet old black dog with grey beard his owner dropped him at the hospice on work days. he enjoyed the air-conditioning, visited Brett's room, to lie with his stomach on the cool floor as Brett lay dying, listening to the black dog's regular breathing.

chin resting on the floor, black dog watched over Brett as his breath weakened.

4 In Sympathy

When I was crying loudly, walking around the boxes of your bits and pieces, sorting shells, feathers, stone tools, fossils of marine creatures collected a Gunn Point, photos of plants, gardens, babies, dogs, red glass cups you put on the louvres to watch the sun pass through, the weighty rib bones of dugong, coloured lures with barbs still attached, books I had inscribed to you, a poem handwritten in 1986, your Graduation Programme, your primary school reports, the ivory fish you chose from Rene's relics, the dragon Louis drew and framed for your birthday, your favourite velour dressing gown you wore on your Black Dog Days, mud crab claw trophies of your most impressive catches, a fish shaped candle, a bowl of spindle reels, when I was wailing loudly, pleading Don't look Brett, Don't look Brett, as I threw some stuff in the rubbish bin, Lily lay on my bed with her brindle head on my fresh pillow-slip, and howled too.

5 Strange food

At 3am I get up to soak dried apricots in a tin of apricot nectar I open a tin of baby food – rice cream the label says – to eat with warm stewed apricots for breakfast.

I feed two chocolates to my grandson, chocolates bought by Cousin Sonya, ones that melted in the warmth of your mouth, the sweet smoothness sliding down your hungry throat.
To your blocked stomach.

With the two packets of red jelly crystals I will make a trifle To eat after we spread his ashes at his favourite fishing spots.

Kaye Aldenhoven
After a year 6 February 2014

The track is a waterway.
We splash downhill downstream, lovely Lily, gorgeous Sully and me.

For a year Sully has searched for Brett, nosing around our places, chasing wind-sounds, smells.

Several times Sully has remembered.
A shy follower of audacious Lily, at the fishing platform

Sully leapt from the back seat, galloped along the floating wooden gangway.
He's remembered night fishing here with Brett.

Where Brett and I pulled stinking mint plants that patch is still weed-free.
Clots of scarlet finches clutch grass, their tiny claws hang on for dear life.

Hens call low from wind shadow, the dogs' paws pink in clear water.

Red spikes of Grevillea dryandra pierce the grass. I don't need to pick one for you, Brett.

I feel you close, walking with me and your dogs, splashing barefoot with them, nosing through the rubbish to see if there's something useful to bring home for your garden.

The year has passed, slowly and fast. Every morning, every afternoon we walk the bush looking for you.

Richard Allen
Kokoda

I breathe in this moment is the same as any other I breathe out beneath every action, every situation, the sameness of the moment I breathe in the thereness of the moment
I breathe out the here-I-am-ness
 of the moment
I breathe in and think back to those men who died in the jungles of Kokoda or who died later like my grandfather from exhaustion or those who died on beaches, in ravines, behind rocks, in the air, on the sea I breathe out I see now that they lived and died in the same thereness of the moment I breathe in we are the same my moment is your moment your breath is my breath my blood is your blood I breathe out all that separates us is the illusion of time the illusion of life the illusion of death I breathe in thank you for sacrificing your moment so that I could have mine

We breathe out

John Bennett
Dusk Deep Creek

Launch Video ↗

Lisa Brockwell
Earth Girls Are Easy

That old song has it wrong, I don't find them easy. When I bring them back to my place they won't relax and let go. I offer them a holiday, a chance to shrug their spirits free from all that bile and bone, that ribcage, lock and key. But they are as heavy as a riverbed, a seam of oil too deep to reach. I see their spark, their potential – at the ski fields or when they're dancing they show me they want to be airborne. So I try to help, to loosen the root so they can wiggle their spirits like milk teeth, ignore the gore, the dull tear and dive through that moment of pulling free. But they never do, they're stuck at the wiggling, endlessly. They prefer to sit in the saddle of pain. I see their thoughts.
What if there's no coming back? I can't leave my children, my friends, my cat. I could switch to earth boys, some swear by them. But they are just as clenched, and more into the spaceship than me. Also ungrateful: when I drop them home they complain about a stopped watch.

Lisa Brockwell
Waiting for the Train

Early spring cherry blossom by the tracks – so prim and so dirty, all at once. The bees must be dropping to their knees. For me, it's after the harvest, only just but even so, a different season. There are elderly women on the platform in beautifully cut coats and expensive shoes.
I know that's where I'm heading, but not yet. I can feel the sap humming in my hips and legs; my hair taken by the wind is still a good thing. You surprise me with coffee and wait with me.
It's unexpected and lovely, your regard. Window box platonic but definitely that spark. Like standing in the sun on a bitter cold day, tasting the froth brim over the top of my cup.
The station master recites where the train is going; no one cares where it has been. I step on with the well-dressed pensioners, my hair warm from the sun.

Jennifer Compton
Like In A Movie

When you know that God doesn't love you any more, if he ever did, and won't move you around the board with a deft hand, for your own good, you might turn to a hefty theory of conspiracy, unfolded in darkened venues at so many frames per second, or in the privacy of your own lounge room on a plasma screen, while the little engine on the shelf below goes un poco agitato.

It all makes sense, or at the least, is meta to your fiction.
They are watching you make a withdrawal from an ATM behind a sheltering hand, and as you walk beside the river they keep a weather eye out. For all you know that timeout that you took in hospital, on the eleventh floor, with a trim nurse who took a special interest in your case, wasn't just another routine procedure, an appendectomy, rhinoplasty.

And now you have a lump under the skin on your wrist that doesn't itch, and suddenly you crave camomile tea and want to buy a gun. Sprung by a ringtone, you concoct an infusion, in your own kitchen, dipping the mesh ball into the pot so many times, exactly. And then, deep sleep and driven dreams. You wake at first light with a fugitive memory of a ride on a helicopter invading your first thought.

There is a gun, that you don't remember buying, glinting in the half light on the windowsill. Where you can't miss it.
The man with the compassionate mouth that contrasts with his cropped hair, raises a finger to tap out your number.
Behind him sits a man with less character who reads code on a monitor. Or it could be a woman, sometimes she wears a pink Chanel suit and a feather boa and smiles at the camera with perfect teeth, as the music swells ma non troppo.

Do you have perfect teeth? No, of course you don't.

Brett Dionysius

Forty-five

The earth did its best to swallow him as a child once. In his backyard things went from green to dead; grass runners petered out like burnt fuses or a satellite map's x-ray of dry river beds. A scarred country with veins of straw-coloured gold that decayed & only made Dalby's black soil wealthier. It was a town coming apart at the seams, as the drought dug in & enfiladed the farmers with relentless fire. The Barley Board's empty concrete silos steamed like a nuclear plant. Bored boys climbed this highest point & surveyed their uniform world or played chicken & shot arrows up into space & waited to see who would run. He couldn't be warned. He played with no shirt on. No hat. In a lab, someone was inventing sun cream & cells dug out of a nostril bullied weaker ones in their agar dish. There were gashes in his mother's lawn, a carnosaur's claw print across its prey's armoured hide; parallel cuts ran in the same direction, as all moisture fled the ground. A mass migration of water molecules that were detained high up in the atmosphere by pressure's chokehold. The gaps looked to him like a poison victim's plum-stained lips & felt like a mouth's taut skin stretched over a rotting skull. The splits yawned black & fit half of his hand, sucked in by the abyssal jaw, when he was game enough to play finger-chicken, quell his trapdoor spider fear & push his arm into the topsoil's maw; a lion tamer backing his skill. This is where all of his working knowledge of the future stopped, as the laws of physics broke down into particles of shadow.

There were thin fault lines within his father too.
His skin became drum-taut over his cheekbones; a landmass picked up by a continental plate & roughed-up into mountains. Corals' sedimentary graveyard that over millennia, metastasised into limestone & matched his father's chalky face.
Then, not even one second of geological time, at forty-five he was pixelated behind his home's screen door, fragmented into a hundred thousand tiny squares; the receptor cells of a praying mantis's compound eye, as this last scene crawled around in his son's head & stalked him. His father was disembodied as he jumped into his friend's car; a loose wire that didn't connect anymore, memory losing power over distance, as his sleepover began.
Or, if time was a set of stairs, than his father fell on the top step. He was diffuse, beekeeper anonymous behind the door's muslin veil as his son drove away.
This follicle-thin barrier, its bottom torn, where cats had tried to force their entrance; sharpened claws extending like broken shinbone through a foot.
Their flash of separation was only fly-screen thick, the breadth of a silicon chip. Out in the backyard the ground refused to shut its trap, where generations of buried pets pushed through to the other side.
The screen was irreparable, as was his father's body, that burned itself out like a giant exhausting its gas.
The coal-dust of his cells creating a new nebula

Anne Elvey
Treasure Hunt

The silver glints in the ti-tree. A clue is wrapped in foil, peeled from the lining of the cigarette pack and rolled into balls. The clue says, look behind the beach hut. The rosaries clack as sister strides through the yard. The bell swings with her right arm. A boy's hands are full of paper. Ten paces from the chapel a blue cape. On Sunday afternoon we play monopoly. I land on community chest. That's Victor's dog, Dad says. A Jack Russell explores the walkers and wheels. When I was a boy, Dad tells me, I made treasure hunts for the other children. What was the treasure? I ask. There was never any treasure. Sister Gertrude sees his cuffs are frayed, the singlet and shirt tucked into his shorts, his socks pulled up in shoes he gives a lick and polish at the gate. Five boys and a girl gather. Once upon a time, Joe says, there was a rider on the moor and mist hung all around. A bird called out a single note and nettles stung. The bell. Dad lies in bed. The TV shows an old war movie. We used to watch Saturday matinees, I say. Hmpyh, says he. Forgive me, she says, as she bustles past in the corridor tight with dinner carts and walkers. She's a nice one, Dad says, likes my little funnies. Dining, Dad sips chardonnay. We'll get there, he says. Joe writes on the back of an old composition. At lunch, a horse whinnies on the moor. Water pools in the ?? asphalt and the shoes. Joe, Joe, a boy yells, I found a clue: under our lady's toe, the crushed head of the snake. I got it Joe. I got it! How many clues are there? I can't wait to see the treasure. A personal attendant admires the picture on his wall: beach huts in a yellow light. I painted that, Dad says, forty years ago. For an hour today, he tells me, they left me in the corridor. I used to be top of my class, Jim says. Jim's lost it, says Dad. The virgin's foot covers a clue. The wattle's gold hides another. We'll get there, Joe tells the children who eat clues for lunch. His mother leaves the church with mop and broom. Sister Gertrude drops a few coins in her hand. A grey shawl hangs on the moor all day. I might be a modern-day Dickens, he writes. Under the crocheted rug at the foot of the bed, the gap for a toe is a word that just escaped him. We'll get there, Dad says. Small fingers wrap clues in silver foil.

Diane Fahey
Heatwave

Near dawn, the house still sweltering, I walk up and down the driveway, breathing slowly as rain comes, almost too soft to feel.
When it stops, the air is taut with new heat.
From the drive I can see the bay's dream-silver, coral cinders in the east.

I'm remembering how, as I grew up the moral rubric was to know your place, not get above or ahead of yourself, and later, too late, never to be down on yourself.
What, then? Walking past the plants in my nightdress, buoyed by tintured green fragrances, I wait for an edge of coolness: at home now in this calm aloneness; this wakefulness.

Angela Gardner Space Faring

for Laika

Our noses pressed against glassed-in reflections: death stars, habitable planets, the deep of distance.

Me and the dog cosmonaut take a space-walk above earth's small diatom. Her crystalline yelp coming back fiery and atomic. Leakage that echoes all her dog-years of accidental radio out in the far beyond.

In this imagined future our bulky selves are weightless far beyond belonging to earth's gravity, alive in the matter-transfer of dreams.

Ian Gibbins
Bayside Reporter

Launch Video ↗

Kevin Gillam
chamber musing

(i) 43 days

all on foot, drug ripe and addled, Tramadols and Endones puppeting mice in the peripherals, trekking lanes and limestone, withered grapes atop walls, to the West sky smeared peach, on the demolition site pink ribbons around the trunks of two tuarts – heritage listed? termites? brake lights and brittling couch grass, the bruising of a week closed, sutures of hours – clockwise is off. to the wharves, slap of ropes and tide, 'Spliethoft', Dutch, engorging. it's a Vaselined moon tonight, March brooding

(ii) venn intersects in this convalescence – good word that with its gauze-like length and syllabic wrap – been practicing the lost art of waiting, bus and train stations, doctors' rooms, never enough shade or new 'New Ideas', been watching, the wizened and the upright, figs ripening, footpaths that flow like prose then trip like misspellings, been rubbing paperbark trees, listening in on frogs, been mulling over the difference between learned and remembered, the venn intersects, making a mantra of 'clockwise is off' while pondering the origin of knowns, the mind that did the choosing, hands that shape our days

(iii) rope armies taken my lungs to ocean, remembering that on taps, clockwise is off, though that is my truth, my tomorrow, not that of the clock hands and been thinking 'bout tides and un-neaping, and lets call it global swarming though we'll never get there of course, when, for every ant there's a human – they know that, 'cos for us

'mining' means 'mine' and we're more blind than they are and while we're making books for our faces they're forming rope armies to bind and save the world

Ron Heard Hedges

sussex

I cycle a country lane one field away from the cliff fields footpaths hedges run to the clifftop cease where the land falls to the sea beside the lane english flowers I am learning to name campion cranesbill samphire in the bright mist the sea is still as milk

this is the place or very like the place where Verlaine spoke of l'échelonnement des haies yet I can find no way to say that in English ranks of hedges scattering of hedges alignments rows upon rows ladderings an unfolding

none will do with those words Verlaine has remade this landscape

l'échelonnement des haies

Siobhan Hodge
After Labé

Il me convient hors de moymesme vivre; Ou fais eoncor que loin sois en sejour.
—Louise Labé, Sonnet 17

Nerve to speak though you plied a quiet retreat after the plague.

La Belle Cordière your ropes still prop an indignant bower lounge room civilities rot in bones planted at your feet.

Beauty in symmetry, your back bares a sweet new abject – tongue rolling curb-chain love, you turn and chide, your teeth crack stones ripped free of Petrarch now, rebuff the cold arms for your own.

Your letters have slipped, lost in a pyre stoked by nameless hands.

You shift now between lines that would pin you through the resin.

John Jenkins

When he read the poem in the room above the stairs

1.

When he read the poem in the room above the stairs,
the walls had been repainted, and a new skylight put in.
As he looked to see that his pages were in order, noticed old photographs of people – older poets he had once known – had been removed, and a glass-topped bench with vases on it.
You approach from the lane. A mirror still on the stairs, and when he glanced, had hardly recognised himself.
As he began to read, the poem had stayed exactly the same as always, not a comma or character or pause had ever been replaced. And, as his voice rose to meet it, he realised how little ever changed.
He was still himself, for better or worse. As always, the audience sat courteously, still listening, and fragile.
Whether full or empty, the room was just a room.

2.

When he read the poem in the room above the stairs, he imagined it was full of blind people, and it was hard to read their expressions. So many dark glasses, black as the shiny coffee served here. He rubbed his eyes.
He knew he'd have to discard the poem he once thought balanced and complete, and continued in a brave, quiet panic.
At which point the room filled with light, which dazzled off the walls and lit up cups. It shot sharp lances from the sides of things, so intense it made his eyes well with tears. He thanked the room, which had shrunk in the glare to the size of a pinhole. Putting the thought away, he smiled.

3.

When he read the poem in the room above the stairs people felt they could hear things they had forgotten.
As he read, and they listened, his voice reached out across the space, or was suspended in the air. Beyond the room, he remembered wind and rain, sighs shot through with longing, sounds climbing like some impossibly high staircase of emotion, that was not his and seemed to belong to no one.
The audience, in contrast, heard sounds of journeys never made.
As he read, all these things could slip away, back into silence: they were accounted for, and finally done. The poem returned to absence where words had been, a listening without regret.
So he raised his voice, and looked down where a girl was doodling the word more in a cold winter's morning.
But it was summer now, and the room flashed past, shuddering, as if at speed, merging into other words not yet written.
He read until the poem was entirely given away. At the end of this, he knew it was not raining outside, and could not be.
He would always be in this room. Had always been, forever.
Beside him, another self sat and wondered. At last, he sipped his coffee, sailed out, still listening carefully. Below the stairs, out in the air, found the marvellous street and sun.

Helga Jermy
Saaremaa

I steal your stories but it is a reverent kind of theft.
It feels like inheritance after loss, greeted by trees that walk in fables, Saaremaa gods born from falling meteorites, all those tales washed in from the sea.
I look only for geography as we drive through the heart of this land, but each tree holds a clue in its DNA.
I welcome the fading light as it stops painting shadows.
I can reach for the dark here.
It is a warm dark, sepia, somehow unaware of its capabilities.

Barbara Kamler

A love letter to my mother-in-law after the portrait of A Levine by Noel Counihan, Melbourne 1953

I see how you look at us, elegant fingers poised, amber beads framing an ochre cashmere twinset.

You are as they say, a beauty, passionate to know more, be more, glue the family heart with fierce ambition and a gentle touch. Your friend the social realist captures your rosy gaze, a stylish ease at odds with tales of you raking those fingers through managed curls, fretting for love betrayed, for children who did not marry as you hoped they would. Let me take you from your chair a while to walk in our garden.

Your son loves me as only men who love their mothers can. These roses grew from rootstock, their white blooms thrill us still and the purple hydrangeas nod yes to all we do, but lately we favour native grasses resilient like you, they thrive here. You know, your children agreed on everything except your portrait so they multiplied your likeness, rotate the original every two years. We have you now, lit up at the end of the hall. I greet you each morning. The night you died you left your criminology essay on the bedside table half-done, a closet of fine silk blouses spattered with cooking oil and rooms full of grieving friends.

I came too late to love you. We are held in filaments of memory – your hand on his, his hand on mine.

Joan Kerr
3 poems

maintenant		ora
l'amandier	Now that the almond tree	mandorlo
perdre	has lost her leaves	perdere
feuilles		foglie
rames	the branches are masts for little birds	rami
petits oiseaux		piccoli uccelli
tout l'hiver	all winter they wait for her	tutto l'inverno
attendre		aspettare
s'épanouir	to bloom into sail	florire
voiles		vele

Christopher Konrad Clock

The minute hand of the old-school metal-red clock falls up, ready to rest at ten pm; Endless love on the radio, small talk about the kids and the movie Calvary which numbed us, and stirred feelings of absence still buried, hidden under the grevillea bowed over my parent's graves somewhere in Mundaring: six inches down, the urns that contain them; the gravel silent underfoot as the wind blows cold over the Bay all the way from frozen Southern seas here, now; look over from the couch, the hand falls up, pummels eleven pm and it's been a long time since we put the kids to bed or I've kissed my father's dying brow as he laid out his regrets like a confession all wasted away. The hand strikes the correct time always; even if the time's wrong, the clock never is.

Bronwyn Lang
Untitled

The heat of the taxi and this particularly hazed morning is one in which circumstance invites confession. We are on our way to see a gynaecologist. I am still high and not yet sober.

My eyes feel discombobulated, set loose and ragged in their sockets.

Silences are fattened with words, fill mouths like fists.

Things we never think of telling are told.

The red dust on our skin streaks with sweat, into watercolours on canvas. We have wound down the windows but the air that enters the car is foetid and tropic. There is dried blood on my heels. I am not wearing underwear.

Tara says now is the right time for stories.

Once she was an actress and met a lover on a game show. Her affairs have ended online or in obsessive analysis. She wants to predict next season's narrative.

Our skulls are hollowed and sit gaunt above our spines. She speaks of struggling.

Going in and out of frame.

Off set. Everything is echolalic.

Her hair is still damp. She has recently showered. We share a preference for drying our skin in draught. Today she has chosen a yellow dress from the many that feature in her bedroom, hooked on doors and shelves as if she lived in a boutique.

This morning there was a rape.

I notice that our hands flutter between our laps and mouths as if we are drawing from imaginary Marlboro lights.

Ray Liversidge
Mindfulness

And unlike Tarzan I'm not buffed or you a comely Hollywood Jane

And I'm trying not to swing from vine to vine (or if I do taking it one vine at a time) but learning how to find the clearing by simply being here

And I haven't learnt my lines for the next scene or if you and/or I are in it...

And I see no ending

Mark Liston
Three Haiku
Campbell Town Tasmania

The sky is at the river ~ a blue wren drinks.

Suddenly a warmer afternoon ~ the taste of apricots

Children in the sunshine ~ shadows play on the grass.

Rose Lucas
Under the Wave

Slipping under the wave – that space where even sand might settle, unswirled, where the turbulence that rakes at the roots of your hair filling it with grit, yanking it back toward the wildness of the surface, a kind of reverse gravity, might yet, like the hand of god, pass over you – slip under the wave, you know its towering confluence of tide and wind, the crushing hammer of its foamy fist; watch, where the form of your flailing, human body, with all its intricacies of angle and organ, might turn its fins in this mottled light, negotiating an ancient element –

slip under the wave,
make for the sky.

Rose Lucas
Unexpected Fall

Barn doors are latched against the snow and a slash of red roof slants across winter's pale, oncoming frame: when a grouse, flecked and surprisingly elegant sails low through the yard, hitting doors with crunch of bone, the rupturing sac – so that an angularity of feathers slides slow toward the still exposed gravel of the drive, trailing bloodied tracks to answer gravity's dark urgings, the density of this clotted earth; even as the honeyed light of lamps springs up in human windows – the silken weave of feather and warm body, the airiness of skeleton, acuity of eye, flight's bold trajectory – all fall askew, broken and cooling already as evening floods the wide and darkening fields of death's wilderness – its blackening grasses, its blank interruption.

Robert Lumsden
Not-Birds

I've had enough of trying to pin you down.
We've all had enough of it. Nobody's succeeded, not even Hardy. (Thrushes don't 'darkle'.) You don't stay put long enough for the fastest quip to catch you.
Even imagination grapples spaces you've vacated.

You'd think we'd take a point after all these centuries, but we don't.
You're so common, that's what gets us.
That some wee shard of something ancient, time's afterthought, could out-do the best we've got to throw at life's incidental challenges to grace — stabbing at a bit of biscuit like a champion fencer, a millimetre dance on rubber feet — it's appalling, frankly. We feel stupid just thinking of it.

Sublating to transcendent meta-smartness doesn't help much, either:

— You are, if any thing (nice one, Schoolman!) the sense of all we make you stand for in that moment when memory is all we know of what you were to us, chads of explanation fabricating recollection —

See? Not even a dogfight using indirection for ammunition keeps bullet holes from punching gotcha emoticons along our fuselage. How proud can we be, witness to your everywhere and nothing-special touch with ecstasy lifting into cloud, earth-bound, acrid, jostling, avid to lay out old truths neatly before we disappear, completely?

Earl Livings Naming Instinct
Sligo, Ireland, August 2009

Not knowing its name, my being On a far-flung island, its creatures Known only by reputation,

I have no choice but to listen: High-pitched chioo, chioo, chioo, or Queeka, queeka, queeka, almost the sound

Of worn brakes jabbed to slow down, Or a thin bronze staff tapped against oak To call ancestors to dark clearings.

Not knowing what it looks like—Midnight, the bird bounding From one branch to the next,

Behind a maze of branches, calling To mate, to mark territory, to state Its own being-bliss—I imagine it

Brindled, slim-bodied, tawny-flecked neck, Oil-gloss eyes that scan always,
Its red beak open, with each note

Chiming leaves and balmy air, all ears, Etymologies of breath behind its eyes.
It knows nothing of thresholds.

Not knowing what to do next, I stop Wondering, stop straining to charm the bird And its rustling, moon-riddled tree,

Open gaze and hearing to whatever waits Beyond the imprints and echoes of words, The swing of breath and song, the poise.

Julie Maclean

Ventenac Nightingale and the Bereaved

You might wonder why he chooses to spend every evening in the churchyard

The wind is bending his tree. It's freezing for June, getting dark too early

He waits for her Jeune girl with the tapestry bag

She doesn't care for his pumped chest, full throat open to the moon, reputation for dazzling arrangements

She is shaking the dead with her whispering, the silent way she opens the gate

Mark Mahemoff
A new premises

I arrive with lunch to find you clearing out years of junk and dust.

You say the man next door has gone bust and now buys stuff from the tip, polishes it up and flogs it off to make ends meet.

I point to what's left of your workshop crammed with half-useful things and contemplate how dreams often end up in mothballs.

We pull down the old roller door and visit your new premises.

It's still a huge expanse of empty cubic metres.

Side by side we stand in the middle of nothing.
I'm finally learning how to be a son.

Colin Montfort Happenstance

the knackery is out of sight surrounded once by christmas trees now factories flourish in the spirit of our ways the flower man invests his stock in cellophane dichroic speckles punctuate the gamy air with paradox and charm around the back the knacker trucks divest their deadstock quietly while dedicated day-trippers scutter by to get away from yesterday missing more than meets the eye sundays on the by-pass others fly the other way homeward bound in habit's spell or stealing back from who knows what some stop fleetingly to stretch a leg or smell the rosy irony the flower man has crazy eyes mesmer eyes unfathomed by the romeos and celebrants of happenstance sundays at the roadside fair

Philip Neilsen Men of a Certain Age

for Bronwyn Lea

They wake on the fringe of a dream after sharp islands and ironic monsters Penelope greets them near the shore her waist carved slim by waiting and war.

They hope the last pulse of waves brings them home without secrets cleansed of betrayal, protected by law that small pale child who danced for applause then lingered on the stairs craving more.

No chance now to gather in grace the rumpled rooms, the impatient worm, wrapped flowers, moon tumbling along the beach, the unknown door.

Voices are muffled in the house windows lit for a stranger.

The molten spark of women of a certain age.

Norm Neill

dominion

(Late winter, sunny afternoon)

The front veranda's warm. A cushion pads the wicker armchair and the view is clear. A noisy miner forages, consuming insects in an orange-marmalade grevillea. A squawk of cockatoos watch overhead, and the house where old Alberto Costa died two days ago still has its curtains drawn. I really must convey my sympathy. The border collie from around the corner, off-leash, pauses yet again beside the tree by Number 35 to sniff the news – official warnings seem like wasted words. A homeless woman in a greatcoat sits at the bus-stop singing Mashed Potato over and over, her worldly goods compressed inside two plastic bags, their tops attached by plaited string to carry on her shoulder. It's still a little early to have her moved along. I sip my coffee – percolated, with a dash of cream. Later, I will stroll across the park, pause briefly by the harbour wall, observe the sailboats swaying at the buoys, and check for barnacles below their waterlines.

Kerrie Nelson
Memento Mori

for Helen after the lawn sale the rest of her things are given away to clear the house for the buyer the seller/inheritor the tjanpi basket comes my way its rim decorated with wisps of blue wool threaded through once-red ininti beans now brown/decaying

it holds six smooth patterned river rocks that pleased the artist's palm, the artist's eye and pleases mine; an almost oval piece of wood blade-shaped, a dot painting of bird/echidna

a torn and faded silk daffodil sits beside a small piece of denim hemmed on two sides; two sides curled and frayed.
A simple two by two inch square (old measurements/older memories) cut and twinned with the daffodil. Yellow leopard skin pattern - crutch of my old jeans - memento of our long week end, the way they unpeeled in her double swag under stars/moon

a five cent piece, purple paper clip silver staple, a bent and rusty nail, dust confirms how the meaning of gifts can unravel - how love itself moves between keepsake/relic

I wash the river rocks until they sing polish the dotted echidna or bird bin the daffodil and denim put aside till later the cast off coin/metallica

years ago, someone told me tjanpi baskets decorated with wool become fodder for moths. I know this to be true as I remove the frail yarn with fingernails/darning needle

I thread the eye with loud pink raffia.
 Red beans, already hotwired, await a lifeline.
 I begin the slow work of attachment recall her last soft morphine drift . . .

tjanpi basket/wooden casket.

Mark O'Flynn
Hit Dog

There is a woman staggering in circles on the front lawn. This happens moments after the tyres squeal and a faint thump interrupts the afternoon's quiet lassitude.

The woman has her hands to her mouth, her jaw agape in nauseous shock.
'I've just hit a dog,' she says.
On the road a small grey twitching bundle.

I want to pat her on the back, calm her down, but see there are other things to happen first.
The dog is breathing, then it stops. Its eyes glaze over, staring at nothing. The woman sobs.

A man who has a pair of gardening gloves lifts the dog off the road. The dog's shit is green.
We wrap an old towel around it.
More people come, a youth with tattoos.

The phone number on the tag on the collar doesn't work. Then it does. Another man who owns the dog comes running from a nearby house still talking on the phone.

The look on his face awry with what storm he knows is coming. New to the neighbourhood, I didn't even know he owned a dog. He puts his face to the dog's, an act too intimate for us.

There is palpable tension between the man cradling his dead dog and the sobbing woman.
I say, 'That's the second time that's happened,' but no one hears me. All the people stand about helplessly: a scene from Brechtian theatre.

It's like the day has been stripped back to its raw suburban elements. Then another woman comes running from the neighbours' house, screaming and running, 'Are you sure?

Are you sure?' They hold the bundle between them and there is more screaming and sobbing.
Then the neighbours take away their dog while we bring the shocked woman, who clearly cannot drive, inside with us. Everyone else moves off into the alarming clarity of the afternoon.

I say again, 'That's the second time that's happened.'

Patricia O’Heare
A Pip, a Secret and a Lucky Coin

Men knit, my old father says carefully caressing his small dog with shovel hands Men knit. One day Country Cousin Nick said, ‘Come into the good room, City John, I’ll tell you a secret. It’s about knitting.’

He’s unswaddling the story as he once, with the showmanship of a parish priest, unknotted the corner of his handkerchief to show me the fossilized tooth he’d found ‘Here’s the true history of the world,’ he’d said

He says now Nick put his secret out like a treasure from the box beneath his bed: the peach pip shriveled like a shrunken head; the coin that took a man to war and back.
Men knit. In all these years, I’ve never told.

That night I get out the album – there’s Nick one ear chewed off by sixty years of sun, looking backwards over his ribbed paddocks, grinning It doesn’t matter at the new pup running across the furrows like a dropped stitch.

Patricia O’Heare
The City of Lost Animals

The harsh wood has retracted its buds like claws. Everything is a bunch of sticks.
Lost animals speak to passers by from paper images of themselves on wooden telephone posts.
The rain is kneading their faces.

Eye-high, they plead domesticity; owners know how unlovely others people’s mess can seem.
They are eloquent through lost eyes; the dog curling like a smile on a leash, the cat with a smile that ends before the photograph.

In spring, when birds come back to perch on the chatting wires the old cat will be there still as if an anaesthetic hasn’t worked, mute when new dogs go by.
The city gives itself to strangers; it’s what cities do best.

Uyen Nguyen
Mary-An Jane

It was the week before the holidays as I sat in the principal's office, recalling what a mistake Mary-An Jane had been.

She had come into the world screaming like a chorus of banshees, looking like the hybrid of a dog and a human,
I had feared she'd been a changeling.

It had gotten worse as she grew up, her laugh was between a snort and a meow, she walked as if her feet were touching lava, she had a collection of her own snot.

But what drove her father and me with urges to return her to the devil was her obsession with Tommy Stark, the supposed love of her life.

Mary-An Jane would watch him nap at school, place her clammy hands on his thighs, follow him when he goes to the bathroom, and describe the size of his penis and tits.

She'd punch girls, who dared look twice his way, imagine touching, licking, kissing his face, bite and chew Tommy Stark's clothes, then keep a collection of the fallen buttons.

Sitting in the office, the principal tells her she has to stop. Immediately the banshee returns, sobbing like a raccoon, screaming to the principal, her mum and dad too, did it all the time.

Tony Page
My Brother Cannot Sleep

Barely thirteen months separate us, Brothers gangling teenage limbs In the bedroom of our shared past.

You, the Olympic athlete, forever Running ahead of yourself But never first over the line.

The fitness I envied in you, Forty years later seems skeletal Beside my pudgy self-acceptance.

It's only on the phone you tell me How you wake sweating from Panic, how you wake

In that million dollar house Your anger manages to maintain, Empty rooms on every floor.

Jeremy Page
Go, But Take These Maps

I.

Overeducated Left out * Right on Underachievers

Instant Outdated

Overcharged
Left wing * Right wing Underpaid

Instagram Out now!

Overtime
Left work * Right hand man Under the pump

Interest free Outbid

Overpopulated
Left for dead * Right near the coast Under surveillance

Indigenous “Outrageous”

Overworked
Left lane ends * Right after the break Underwhelming

Inherent OUTSTANDING

II.

x	spatial	carry yourself
y	hierarchical	move up z	social	move in

III.

o v e r b o
a r d l e f t o v e r s r i g h t e o u s d o
w n u n
d e r

IV.

Insiders Included Invited

Outspoken
Out of bounds Out, out, out.

over and over overt undertones navigating is easy, just know your place.

Vanessa Page
Signs of life

Below the port-facing ribs of the old town the body of the St Lawrence River is laid out

October clears the decks, blows the last of the tourists down the creases of the Vieux Montreal

In stone-walled urban pockets, spot fires burn with the suddenness of maple leaves, an ox-blood undertow, turning slowly to face the fall

I am glowing from the inside too, but with a migrational pull that is much less seasonal barely noticeable under grey-marbled sky, a gentle drift of ashes with no shaft of light for reveal

How strange that I keep finding myself here, lost in a crush of North American monuments navigating unexpected points of cultural difference and icebox doors weighted against winter's shoulder

Small, unfamiliar birds are fleeing this place and each flight pattern catches like something intimate

When I return to my body, the city continues, as all cities do the towering heartlands of vacant gods growing closer

Even here, inside the Basilica on Rue St Sulpice comfort is temporary, a sub judice resting place for my own turning chrysalis

Inside the emptiness of noise, the acoustics are perfect for a new heartbeat, I can't hear yet.

Janette Pieloor
Before

It was before/ you told me the books I'd taken from the shelves were those I could get on kindle/ told me my pacing along our orange gravel path was mimicking Stevie Smith's Raven anger freed and all I would see would be the pink bottle brushes without an exit/ told me that old ginger cat's squeaky meow each time I passed wasn't a sign/ that no one knows the mathematics of the pyramids/ and anti-gravity technology has not yet been discovered/ told me that sky's colour will change one day/ and you and I and all of us are part of the universe experiencing itself/ that it was before the last time you and I were together/ when I asked you did you know where the children's books were and you said no/ when I found the cowry shell and put it to my ear to listen to the tides/ when I left and took the sea with me/ that I knew I had loved you/ before:

Robyn Rowland
Poppy Picking

for Meral, Bozcaada island/Tenedos

Not the soft wrinkled skin of old men – papery, easily torn – or the crumpled blooms in our town plots.
Upright as tulips, Turkish Red Poppies are firm and sure they need just four petals, bright scarlet, red as red can get, each with its eye black khol.

We are laughing like children racing through fields-full, higher than our knees.
They crowd the narrow roads of your island spilling across runnels, under fences as if they were once water, spreading in a flood.

We are poppy hunters, poppy-picking.
We run ahead of the other women, driving to lane's end, friends' building sites competing for the best field to harvest.
You hold them hostage with talk, while I grab and gather.

We pluck the four petals. Pollen-loaded stems are shocked, naked, worrying how to attract bees.
Velvet along our fingers we recall our babies' skin, filling bucket after basket, harvesting 'til your small pale-green car is loaded with the lightness of their feather-weight.

At the house we wash them outside in basins.
Small creatures emerge to be purged, bits of grass, poppy seeds, perhaps enough to charm a winged monkey, put a lion to sleep on their trudge behind the rainbow.

Over and over we rinse them, spring heat on our backs, flowers ruffling and crinkling in our cool hands.
It's like washing silk shirts. The pot in the kitchen is boiling its sugary clouds. Your secret ingredient I am to take with me to the grave is wafting old morocco in.

When the jam is ready it cools into dark-claret shades ready to sit in my bags with poppy lokum, red-poppy syrup travelling back to a country where red poppies only ever meant grief over fields full of bodies of young men, a generation of women left unmarried, lonely.

Now – you say to me – when you see red poppies you will think of this:
friendship in spring, wild beauty and its fruit; 'gelincik', that means lovely young brides in their ladybird beauty, black eyes shining with happiness, the touch of velvet, sunshine, wet silk, and sweetness of jam on the tongue.

Christopher Race
It is Quite Difficult

Sometimes it is quite difficult to hold hands with anyone.
The music fades, it's easy to lose the beat.

Tap it out in the silence when the sky doesn't look right when you know all your gestures are wrong.

Hard to find a hand that knows what to do.
Take dishes from the rack.
Touch sharp blades to a tight face.

I hold my breath, it's all I have; wait out the beat, the clap of hands. There it is, the sky ridged and grey, calls to me to look up.

Ian C. Smith
The Seduction of Maps

King tide ebbing, the submerged wreck is bared like my stark ex-life whenever I am here.
Brief childhood, rain on windows, budgeted love, bottled beer in front of black and white TV, canned laughter or boxers from the slums.
The urge to leave for anywhere pulling me, annual leave expands to three weeks, a windfall but stubborn scrimpings fall short of a holiday.
Now those stilled voices dwell here in my blood.

These island summers, marine light between mountain and harbour, theories about weather, a yacht from the big race shares our haven as Pacific gulls hover in a Force Eight gale eyeballing me on my verandah with a view.
We gossip or scrabble for clever small words waiting out the wind, then walk or bathe, braving whitecaps ever eroding these dunes.
I count what I have won in my dwindling days.

Pam Schindler
Man sleeping

it curls beside me at night flanks just touching it is sunk deep in sleep it is a man, or rather it is an ocean sleeping along the sand under its reflective sky the tribes who breathe water are finning their unseen trails – rapt, under the moon, their marvellous seasons of seeding and rebirth –

I would draw your hips to me their silvery catch but you have gone deep far under the swell and sparkle, with the slow breath of waves and you would not know me there

Pam Schindler
Rain

I went out in the slow bloom of rain, wet petals on my skin the sleeping ibis were folded white packages lodged in the high branches

I went out into the white air, into the misty quiet the river slipping fast, striped darkness and silver

I swam under a cataract of hectic lorikeet chatter then out into the calm, the eddy the slow warm bloom in the riverbank trees the slow warm bloom of rain

Laura Shore
What I want to know

It's the only four-letter word no one utters in our house.

I dare ask her once, face flushed with fever, head in her lap, staring up at her peach pit chin, smoke of her cigarette curling from her nose.

Her considered reply, What do you think?

I think not when she refuses to sign me up for dance class, too clumsy.

Not, after school when we find her napping on the couch, dirty laundry strewn from baskets, dinner unmade.

Not when she yanks at the tangles in my hair and threatens to chop it all off.

Yes, when she feeds me pink aspirin and mends my hem.

Yes, when we share an air mattress and ride waves to the shore.

Yes, when we walk in the forest and she teaches me the names of trees.

Not, when she slaps me for wearing lipstick and calls me a whore.

Not when she says there is only one good man in this world and I've got him, so you're out of luck.

Not when she invites my husband to move in after we've separated.

Yes, when she throws a party to launch my first book.

Yes, when she says, If I had a voice like yours I'd never stop singing.

No, when she no longer remembers my name.

No, when she thinks I'm her older sister, the one she hates.

No, when she tells my dying father to send me home.

Yes, when she lets me kiss her cheek and begs me to come back soon.

Alex Skovron
The Glovebox Dispensary

Up at the Old Jefferson they're chuckling over their cabernets, arguing over small beers—the dental nurse whose boss will caress her cheek for another month; the weepy genarian, octo, nona, who has just discovered a cure for cancer, his latest amazing MRI; the cabman with the falling flag alert for a hail, a glovebox his dispensary, the big V ('never lets me down'); the professor's protégée with her Sexton thesis first-classed already by the poet she loves, alive only in his departmental clasp. That's just a taster—there's the CEO, Estelle, whose partner roams the playing-field weekends, Thursdays companions her and her mum to gallery affairs, he knew Whiteley once (personally: they were like this!) back in the sixties; and old McHale, he took Mr Eternity's hand when Stacey (he calls him) went astray one day casing the Cross; nobody really believes him, or little Max who claims he jammed with Satchmo, Cleveland, '48.
But this is Friday night, the claymen's kiddush, all the cloned girls' benediction. Candlelight and tipsy brazen their coin, singe their perukes, commerce ricochets round the temple pediments; the Doric columns lean in, listening for clues.

Alex Skovron
Zugswang

Soon only the past will know what we know.

—C. K. Williams

His thoughts leapt, flew outward, fell inward, layered as the rings of Saturn, trenched like the circles of Hell.
Dogs below his window marauded his dreams but ambled away the moment he awoke, replaced by the dissonant slipstream of the arrogant: shrill cars, crippled lorries, crass motorcycles—whatever he tracked with his hapless gaze would exchange its quotidian form for a thing shapeless and sidereal, but bereft of light's warming mirages.
A neighbour stumbling drunk up the clattery stairs with a hefted paramour unsettled him rather than annoyed, or a fellow-lodger who poked his sallow chin round his doorjamb, carelessly, uncharacteristically ajar, prompted from his cumbrous lids a lava of unsuspected tears that trembled him.
If he submerged to a needed convenience mart of an evening, he felt tailed by grinding whispers of unease, his head pounding out of heart's kilter, his pulse in his throat. An arthritic medico once had advised yoga, meditation, antidepressants—an affront to his travails. Did he enjoy, in some fevered niche of his martyrdom, this unceasing cataract of recoil, this deafening hum of atrocity hounding him, snuffling around him like the mongrel dogs below—circling his sullen confinement, saturnine, infernal, layered as the stone strata of thought.

Patricia Sykes
En Route

It becomes possible to envy a train, its metal rockety-rock transforming into soothe, sway.
Between dream and alert between crash and sabotage the mind a travelling landscape through city, suburb, to paddock where what grazes behind wire appears an untroubled feeding.
Until and then and when between one stop and the next the skeleton of a derelict house rises from abandoned ground and sings of empty beds and of the cold hearth of a sun that refuses to shine on another day of killings.
By way of postscript a yellow leaf is wind-flung against speeding glass but is not an explosive except for the way its beauty tears a hole through the heart.

Gillian Telford
a weight of hair

On hot days, you see girls doing it everywhere — by a fountain, at a desk, sitting on a bus or under a tree. In languid sequence, they lean forward, close their eyes, raise their arms, lift and hold a load of hair from the neck then wait — maybe wait some more — before they let it fall, heavy on the shoulders. Or they lift and twist, fiddle with clips and bands, secure the coil high on their heads so air can reach and cool.

You saw it too when she sat up in bed, drenched with fever; thumped and turned the pillow, arced back to lift the sweat-dark hair from her face and cried that's enough. Younger still, a hot tired child running towards you — how your fingers eased beneath the collar to free the clinging strands.

You see a woman, sometimes serene, sometimes weary but still there, head held high, and all you want to do is reach out and lift, like a memory, the weight of her hair from the nape of her neck.

John Upton
4711

You dabbed it on like goodness, and the scent intoxicated me. Once, to impress, I looked it up, found a Cologne address during Napoleon's wars. You didn't care – history was now, and now must be mis-spent with pheromones like music in the air.

But pheromones confuse. I'm readdressing your letters in the kitchen, and your favourite scarf's in my pocket. Though I'm over it I can inhale and in an instant go there.
Insane. For there I was, and you confessing you'd followed other pheromones elsewhere.

Rose van Son
Almost Blind

She holds the basket like a cup hollowed and napkin-lined cradled white, and in that hollow three guavas reticent to show themselves she walks as if she carries a treasure chest against her own her pale skin deep, a vest warming what has been eight decades, more than that she walks on patterned floor so long each wandering step just long enough to show a confidence to those who watch then at last, the door she reaches most – lifts handle, turns, her body follows close as if it is something new she's learnt and all the while the guavas in that hollow guard her as she folds.

Rob Walker
a clarity of smog

nine days in japan and already you're a megalomaniac drunk on the fame of being slightly apart. backhome there are bushfires and The Test on tv but here you're in the manic phase of a bipolar New Year.

even getting off the train at the wrong station when you can't read the signage and no-one speaks your mothertongue doesn't phase you. a divine messenger disguised as a middlelevel clerk tells you that the train to Mega is nexto-nexto.

You're completely alone in your ipod universe as Antony sings everything is new in the space between your ears and you walk the winter greyconcrete streets of Mega / Shikama houses & steel smokestacks beside a river tamed with cement.

refinery pipes, mega-pylons supporting arcs of cable inscribed from somepoint above and triangulations of scaffolding infrastructure your artificial horizon.

you know in your bones that the sun rising red through smog is rising just for you and despite photochemical haze there's a clarity like individual rainbow ice crystals refulgent on dead rice stalks beneath your feet.

the day is new. those birds you pass have migrated from siberia to forage for insects between the backstreet cabbages at this precise second for your entertainment alone. you love each moment. like now. and this one now.

the entire day is unfolding. you don't need a god when the Universe is so perfect and selforganised. each day dripping into the vast pool of dayspent.

occasionally we find ourselves at an intersection where any choice will be the right one.

Rob Walker
Yama Reflecting

Launch Video ↗

James Walton
Autumn Break

Spooky day. Mist so low and custard thick The river noiseless, a longboat prow Could come across the veranda.
Cats have embraced all of yoga, curled As mollusc shells where spines shouldn't bend.
The orchard stripping crows are finally speechless, Stooped in their overcoats, raggedly on guard For something with the password.
The air's gone tidal, receding to the call Now of a forming universe in the melting: A calf's foghorn announces loss of presence, Chickens rattle for release from the night keep.
Radio silence while this anabiotic lid Occupies the space that was daylight saving.

Jen Webb

For a painting in a rented beach house

Such a mistake to mix aqua with pink; and it's all so banal: a beach; a boat. Those harmonics don't ring true.

The sea sounds its note, a suffocated tone. The air drains its vessels, blows it dry. That same note sounds beneath the bed, from trails of beach sand, memories of moths, those misremembered thoughts.

Close the door. People will always mill outside and strangers will watch.

Time moves too slowly now. And me, I'm adrift in memories. Close the door, scoop up the wounded thought; wind the clocks, reset the hands.

Matt Wills
Driving Home

The afternoon's self-assuredness Presses on through mile-upon-mile Of wind over the wheat-fields' arc and flow, Where approaching crest promises, Then sudden horizon runs, its laughter mocking The miles and weary soul and the longing for familiar Faces and furniture that make furrows like lanes In the wheat's memory, the road sole in its scarring, Black-blood trail as grey evening looms Eastward, homeward.

Ahead the speck of a crow escapes from road-kill To sky, heralding the first car in half a day,

The slipstream buffeting and abrupt amidst The low-sun's languor through the back window.
In another hour the wheat is gone and last light Shows aimless cows with straining udders That same path I strain to see against The paint-flecked darkness unfinished ahead.

Jena Woodhouse

Why I am loath to discard glass

A friend sends me a message to thank me for the jars I left for her to fill with jam or lemon curd or marmalade.
Why is it I cannot discard containers made of glass – the kind you buy with honey or tahini, pasta sauce or cherries – dark Morello cherries with cheeks pressed against the sides?

Behind this hard, smooth, light-reflecting clarity lies alchemy.
Imagine the first fusion more than three millennia ago, in Syria or Egypt – the awe that something so refined could issue from the elements of silica and soda ash, and fire: engendering desire to replicate this feat, explore the forms implicit in the malleable mass; reveal the secrets in the oxides codified by heat, imbuing glutinous material with lucent elegance in delicate small flasks for unguents, in perfume vials; tinting the annealing magma ruby, topaz, emerald – the undreamt-of counterfeit of gems in vitreous array that lured the affluent to buy; to covet or bestow, display.

These plain jars, mass produced, hark back to those arcane experiments, heirs to a noble lineage nouveau plastic cannot emulate; their genealogy replete with farmhouse pantries marshalling the ranks of storage jars for scented, mouth-tempting comestibles: conserving blushing saffron peaches, ruddy plums, pale pears, ripe berries; figs and hazelnuts and raisins; spices in small, precious phials. Apothecary jars in grocery stores, stuffed full with striped bull's eyes.

Once, in a Greek museum I saw slender birds of Roman glass, translucent cerulean as Delphic skies in early spring, so very finely formed that if the plate-glass case were opened, they would fly as high as larks, though those blue avians would never sing.
Pressed beneath earth and masonry for centuries, recently they surfaced from their trajectory through time intact – vessels empty but for breath of someone's lungs immured in them, embodying the principle of flight, the hue of boundlessness.

Kimberley Zeneth
Stepmother Country

I come to a sunless, nameless beach Its few shifting sands inlet to the percolating brine below the cliff rugged waters tug at me pull at the sleeve of who I might have been if I had stayed above the cliff, a mug on stone plastic bags knotted to a rope a hole in the rock, a sodden mat a shallow cave offers respite from the ravages of wind and the attention of tourists here on the edge someone has built a humble place for sleep, for food for looking outwards, searching inwards a slow meanderer who returns on days her feelings match this place to step past weathered rags tied to sticks the random shells and stones of years collected, thrown down, piled in meditation on a still afternoon far gone a trail of broken bottle glass scattered outwards in a wide arc green and brown glinting in weak sunlight a path that might have been a way out the gulls' cries echo out over the breaking of a billion tiny things she wails too, her mouth long ago forgotten by the shapes of words

I imagine her staring out from the salt-scrub – wind and silence her familiars at the tripod meeting of earth, sea, sky she makes the fourth; fire, boils water for tea a yeti exiled, weathered hands lift the can it's going to be wild later tonight this is stepmother country the enamel cup burns her thumbs she sits solidly and she blinks sipping brine-tainted water on the brink of a drowning land

Contributors

Susan Adams PhD is an Australian poet published widely. She was awarded 'Commended' in the 2012 O'Donoghue International Poetry Competition (Ire), 'Highly Commended' in the Val Vallis Award 2012, (Au), 'Highly Commended' in the Adrienne Abbott Poetry Prize 2012.(Au) and short listed for the inaugural Axel Clark Poetry Prize 2014. She has been read numerously on ABC Radio National. Her first book Beside Rivers released by Island Press. (2013) was awarded 'Commended' in the FAW Anne Elder National Literary Award.

David Adès lives in Pittsburgh. A member of Friendly Street Poets since 1979, his poems have appeared widely in Australia and the U.S. He won the inaugural University of Canberra Vice-Chancellor's International Poetry Prize 2014 and was shortlisted for the Newcastle Poetry Prize 2014.

Kaye Aldenhoven lives in the wet-dry tropics. She is passionate about family, her garden, NT plants and birds, NT history and poetry. Kaye has three published collections; In my husband's country, SKIN and Botanica erotica, from Chris Mansell's PressPress. The poem in this anthology is about the death of Kaye's son.

Richard James Allen's recent collection of poems, Fixing the Broken Nightingale (Flying Island Books) is his tenth book as a poet, fiction, performance writer and editor: fixingthebrokennightingale.com. Widely published in anthologies, journals and online since winning the 'under-21 section' of the English Teachers Association of NSW National Writing Competition in 1980, Allen has been the recipient of numerous awards, nominations, grants, as well as opportunities for presentations, screenings and broadcasts, in a unique international career as an acclaimed writer, director, choreographer, filmmaker, performer, new media artist, and scholar. Further information at The Physical TV Company website: www.physicaltv.com.au. Richard James Allen's ten books of poetry, fiction and performance texts include Fixing the Broken Nightingale (Flying Island Books), The Kamikaze Mind (Brandl & Schlesinger) and Thursday's

Fictions (Five Islands Press), shortlisted for the Kenneth Slessor Prize for Poetry. He won the Chancellor's Award for most outstanding PhD thesis at UTS. physicaltv.com.au

John Bennett is a poet and photographer who has left the Sydney's Inner West for greener views. His video-poetry (with John Laidler) has been shown on TVS and at various festivals, including the Sydney Writers Festival and the Newtown Underground Film Festival.

Margaret Bradstock has six published collections of poetry, including The Pomelo Tree (winner of the Wesley Michel Wright Prize) and Barnacle Rock (winner of the Woollahra Festival Award, 2014). Editor of Antipodes: poetic responses to 'settlement', Margaret recently won the national Earth Hour poetry competition and the Banjo Paterson Award.

Lisa Brockwell lives near Mullumbimby with her husband and son. She has been shortlisted for the Newcastle, the University of Canberra, the Australian Catholic University and the Montreal International poetry prizes and highly commended in the Bridport Prize (UK). Her poems have appeared in The Spectator, Australian Love Poems, Eureka Street and Best Australian Poems (2014).

Jennifer Compton lives in Melbourne and is a poet and playwright who also writes prose. Now You Shall Know has just been published by Five Islands Press and Mr Clean And The Junkie is due out soon with Makaro Press.

B. R. Dionysius was founding Director of the Queensland Poetry Festival. His poetry has been widely published in literary journals, anthologies, newspapers and online. His eighth poetry collection, Weranga was released in 2013. He lives in Ipswich, Queensland, where he runs, watches birds, teaches English and writes contemporary sonnets

Anne Elvey is author of Kin (Five Islands, 2014) and three poetry chapbooks. She is managing editor of Plumwood Mountain: An Australian Journal of Eco-poetry and Eco-poetics and holds honorary appointments at Monash University and University of Divinity, Melbourne.

Angela Gardner's most recent collections are The Told World (selected poetry) from Shearsman Books UK and Thing&Unthing, from Vagabond Press, Sydney Australia, both published in 2014. She is an editor at foame.org and is also a visual artist.

Ian Gibbins has been a neuroscientist and Professor of Anatomy at Flinders University. He is now a widely published poet and electronic musician. Urban Biology (Wakefield Press, 2012) was his first full collection and in 2014 he produced The Microscope Project: How Things Work. iangibbins.com.au

Kevin Gillam is a West Australian poet with three books of poetry published, other gravities (2003) and permitted to fall (2007) both by Sunline Press and songs sul G in Two Poets (2011) by Fremantle Press. He works as Director of Music at Christ Church Grammar School in Perth.

Ron Heard enjoys life in the inner suburbs of Brisbane with the heat, rain and backyard chooks. He helps care for his disabled son and edits The Mozzie an inclusive poetry magazine that publishes over 400 poems per year. His most recent publication is the verse novel The Shadow of Troy.

Siobhan Hodge is a doctoral candidate at the University of Western Australia from the discipline of English, studying Sappho's poetry and its translation. She has published one chapbook, Picking Up the Pieces, and has had poetry published in several places, including Cordite, Peril, Kitaab, Verge, Yellow Field, and Page Seventeen.

John Jenkins lives on Melbourne's rural fringe: his most recent poetry title is Growing Up With Mr Menzies (John Leonard Press, 2008). His poems have been widely anthologized and broadcast; and he has written, co-written or edited 24 books; mainly poetry, but also on travel, music and some short fiction.

Helga Jermy is an English/Estonia poet born in the UK and now living in Tasmania. Her work has appeared in various publications including Cordite, Regime, Rabbit Journal and online at Australian Poetry.

Barbara Kamler is a Melbourne poet and consultant on academic writing and publishing for doctoral and early career researchers. She is completing two collections of poetry, Family Scraps and Leaving New Jersey. She recently published Helping doctoral students write: Pedagogies for supervision, Second edition (with P. Thomson 2014, Routledge).

Joan Kerr is a widely-published poet with numerous awards. She is also, with Gabrielle Daly, the comic novelist Gert Loveday (Writing is Easy and Crane Mansions). They blog on books and writing at Gert Loveday - Fun With Books.

Christopher Konrad is a Western Australian writer. He has co-authored a recent book of poetry with two other WA poets, Sandfire (2012) published by Sunline Press and has poems and short stories published in many journals and on line. His book Letters to Mark is published by Regime Books.

Bronwyn Lang has had several poems published in print and online journals both in Australia and overseas. She is currently writing and residing in Tasmania.

Rose Lucas is a Melbourne poet whose collection Even in the Dark was published by UWAP in 2013. She is the winner of the Mary Gilmour award for poetry 2012-2014. She is also a freelance academic, currently working at Victoria University.

Mark Liston lives in Tasmania and has published widely, including the Roland Robinson and Newcastle Prize anthologies, won the 2013 All Poetry Prize and was the Australian Poetry Café Poet in Residence in Newcastle. His collection Fragile Diamonds is published by Picaro Press.

Ray Liversidge's latest book is No suspicious circumstances: portraits of poets (dead) published this year by Littlefox Press with illustrations by Kathryn Bowden. His other books are: Obeying the Call; The Barrier Range and Triptych Poets: Issue One; The Divorce Papers. Ray has his own website at poetry.wordpress.com.

Earl Livings has published poetry and fiction in Australia and also Britain, Canada, the USA, and Germany. He taught in the Professional Writing & Editing course for 17 years and is currently working on a novel and his next poetry collection. His writing focuses on nature, mythology and the sacred.

Robert Lumsden lives an hour north of Adelaide by rail, and has recently been published in the Australian Poetry Journal and Cordite Poetry Review. Robert has published a novel as ebook Sojourn, and literary criticism Reading Literature after Deconstruction. He is currently completing several novels.

Julie Maclean has had poetry shortlisted for the Crashaw Prize (Salt), Whitmore and Press Press prizes, and was a joint winner of the Geoff Stevens Poetry Prize (UK). She is the author of When I saw Jimi (Indigo Dreams) and Kiss of the Viking (Poetry Salzburg). Poetry and short fiction features in international journals and The Best Australian Poetry (UQP) and Forthcoming in Poetry (US). Blogging at juliemacleanwriter.com

Mark Mahemoff is a full-time Couple Therapist. He has published three collections of poetry, most recently Traps and Sanctuaries (Puncher & Wattmann, 2008)

Colin Montfort lives in a mobile home, touring Australia and writing. His poems reference sometimes real, often illusory needs and perceptions that prop up mainstream beliefs. He was published in Writing Ventures Best Poems of 2013 Anthology and is a finalist in the Aesthetica Writing Award for Poetry 2014.

Norm Neill's poetry has appeared in journals, anthologies and The Sun-Herald. He read at the 2012 Sydney Writers' and Newtown festivals. His poems have twice been placed in the Inner City Life competition. He convenes a poetry workshop and publishes a newsletter listing NSW poetry events.

Philip Neilsen's most recent collection is Without an Alibi (Salt, 2008). His work has since been included in the anthologies Australian Poetry Since 1788 and The Penguin Anthology of Australian Poetry, among others. He is a poetry tutor at the University of Queensland and adjunct professor at QUT.

K.A. Nelson was born and raised in Mudgee, NSW, and studied English Literature/Drama at the University of New England. She's won three poetry prizes since 2010 when she left full time work. She feels equally at home in the Tanami Desert, Tuscany or Canberra, where she and her daughter have lived since 1995.

Uyen Nguyen is a Professional and Creative Writing student at the Queensland University of Technology. Ever since a young age, she has had a keen interest in writing short stories and fell in love with writing poetry after studying it at University.

Diane Fahey is the author of twelve poetry collections, most recently The Wing Collection: New & Selected Poems and The Stone Garden: Poems from Clare, both shortlisted for major poetry awards. She has won various poetry prizes, and in 2014 received a literary grant from the Australia Council to support the writing of a poetry collection set in the West of Ireland.

Mark O'Flynn has published four collections of poetry, most recently Untested Cures, (2011). His poetry and short fiction have appeared in many Australian journals. His novels include Grassdogs (2006), and The Forgotten World, (Harper Collins, 2013). He has also published the comic memoir False Start. A collection of short fiction, White Light, was published by Spineless Wonders 2013.

Patricia O'Heare has had work published in Australia and Ireland. Her first collection Tender Hammers was published by Five Islands Press. O'Heare has co-authored two books on teaching poetry. A chap book Fear of Umbrellas was published by Mark Time Books in 2013.

Jeremy Page has just finished a Masters of Creative Writing at The University of Sydney, and is set to begin an English PhD in 2015. He is currently in the process of collecting his poetry to seek publication.

Tony Page's third book, Gateway to the Sphinx (Five Islands) appeared in 2004. For 20 years, he worked in Thailand and Malaysia; but now lives in Australia. Has has written for the stage, with Who Killed Caravaggio? completed in 2009. Recently published in Eureka Street, The Australian Poetry Journal, Right On, and The Canberra Times. Tony is now finalising a fourth collection of poetry.

Vanessa Page is a Cashmere-based poet who hails from Toowoomba in Queensland. She has published two collections of poetry: Feeding Paper Tigers (ALS Press, 2012) and Confessional Box (Walleah Press, 2013). Confessional Box was the winner of the 2013 Anne Elder Award.

Janette Pieloor lives in Canberra and has been published in anthologies and journals since 1991, including in The Best Australian Poems 2011 (Tranter, Black Inc). Her collection of poetry Ripples under the skin will be published by Walleah Press early in 2015.

Christopher Race's poems have appeared in The Paradise Anthology 5 (2011) and the MPU publication The Attitude of Cups (2011), his work has also appeared in the Australian Poetry Members' Anthology (2013). He was a prize winner in the inaugural Glen Phillips Poetry Prize (2012).

Robyn Rowland has six books of poetry, and two forthcoming in 2015: Line of drift (Doire Press, Ireland) and intimate war. Gallipoli/Canakkale 1915 (Melbourne, Turkey). Seasons of doubt & burning. New & Selected Poems (2010) represented 40 years of work. Her poetry appears in national and international journals and anthologies.

Pam Schindler is a Brisbane poet. Her first book of poems, A sky you could fall into, was published in 2010 by Post Pressed. In 2013 she went to live and write for a month in a Scottish castle, as recipient of a Hawthornden fellowship.

Laura Jan Shore is the author of Breathworks and Water over Stone, winner of IP Picks Best Poetry 2011, Interactive Press. Winner of 2012 Martha Richardson Poetry Prize, 2009 FAW John Shaw Nielson Award and 2006 CJ Dennis Open Poetry Award, her poetry's been published on four continents.

Alex Skovron is the author of six collections of poetry, most recently Towards the Equator: New & Selected Poems (Puncher & Wattmann). He was born in Poland, arrived in Australia aged nine, grew up in Sydney, lives in Melbourne, and works as a freelance book editor.

Ian C Smith's work has appeared in The Best Australian Poetry, London Grip, New Contrast, Poetry Salzburg Review, Quarterly Literary Review Singapore, The Weekend Australian and Westerly. His latest book is Here Where I Work Ginninderra Press (Adelaide). He lives in the Gippsland Lakes area of Victoria, Australia.

Rose van Son is a Perth-based writer and poet whose work has appeared in Westerly, Landscapes, Cordite, Indigo, JukeBox, and more; she has won places in the Tom Collins Prize, Peter Cowan, Karen W. Treanor, Fremantle Press Tanka, and haiku. Her collections are in Sandfire and Three in the Campagna.

Patricia Sykes is a poet and librettist. Her collaborations with composer Liza Lim have been performed in Australia, Paris, Germany, Russia, New York and the UK. She was Asialink Writer in Residence, Malaysia, 2006. Her most recent work is The Abbotsford Mysteries (Spinifex Press, 2011).

Gillian Telford is a NSW Central Coast poet. Her first collection, Moments of Perfect Poise, (Ginninderra) was published in 2008. She is working on a second collection, An Indrawn Breath, with the assistance of a Varuna/Picaro Press 2014 Publisher Introduction Program Fellowship.

John Upton's poetry has been published in Best Australian Poems 2014, SMH, The Australian, Canberra Times, and in many literary magazines. He has had five stage plays produced and has written for television drama series. His political comedy Machiavelli won the Australian Writers Guild's award for Best New Play.

Rob Walker writes poetry, music, essays, short stories, reviews, occasional Christmas cards and shopping lists. Some of these have been published all over the world. His newest collection Tropeland will be published by Five Islands in June. He lives in the beautiful Adelaide Hills (Australia's best-kept secret). robwalkerpoet.com

James Walton lives in the Strzelecki Mountains. His work has appeared in many journals,

The Age, and several anthologies. He was shortlisted for the ACU National Literature Prize 2013, and Specially Commended in The Welsh Poetry Competition 2014. He was once a librarian, mushroom pallet maker, and elected union officer.

Jen Webb is Director of the Centre for Creative and Cultural Research at the University of Canberra. She is author of a small collection, Proverbs from Sierra Leone (FIP 2004), and a number of other books including, most recently, Foucault: A Critical Introduction (Sage 2012).

Matt Wills is a blogger, travel writer, poet, writer for TV, and professional voice-actor. Though a writer of poetry for many years, his first book of poems, Asleep in the Russian Museum, was only published in 2011. He is about to publish his second book of poems.

Jena Woodhouse's poems were shortlisted in the Montreal International Poetry Prize 2013 and the ACU Prize for Literature 2013; longlisted in the University of Canberra Vice-Chancellor's International Poetry Prize 2014. Her translations from Russian of poems by Vera Pavlova and Olga Sedakova, commissioned by CAL in collaboration with The Red Room Company and Lyrikline, appear on the Red Room site and also on lyrikline.org (Berlin). She was a Hawthornden Fellow (2011) and on retreat at La Muse (France) in 2014. She has been awarded a residency and a bursary at CAMAC Centre d'Art, Marnay-sur-Seine (France) in 2015.

Kimberley Zeneth's first book is Awake During Anaesthetic (National New Poets Program 2009). In addition to a Poetry Masterclass (Ron Pretty) and a Fiction Fellowship at Varuna, projects include poetry installation for Adelaide Fringe and Wirranendi Sculpture Trail commissioned by Adelaide City Council. She lives in the desert with her wife.

ap Australian Poetry The power of words

Our poetry culture needs to be heard Australian voices enriching the world

Dear Friends of Poetry,

Australian Poetry recently issued a statement of regret in response to the ABC's decision to cease production of Poetica. We asked that lovers of poetry write to the papers, the ABC board, the Minister for Communications and their local federal member to register their disappointment at this deeply unfortunate consequence of reduced federal government funding of the ABC.

We were not alone in our disappointment; various Australian voices took up our call to arms and were united in expressing their dismay.

"With the execution of Poetica, Australian culture is diminished." —Sunday Age, 30 November 2014

Barry Hill's article was a passionate lament to the loss of a radio program dedicated to poetry and broadcast to an estimated 60,000 listeners per week.

Like Barry, you may have objected to "the execution of poetry" or despaired at your capacity to make a difference, "as I gird myself to make a case for poetry, I can see the piss going into the wind."

Australian Poetry will not stand idly by. We are determined to keep alive our poetry culture by raising funds to continue the tradition of Poetica through a new podcast series. A dollar per week for a year from 60,000 listeners would be a great start!

Help us to maintain the spirit of Poetica, please donate online at:
australianpoetry.org/support/donate-to-ap

Or send a donation by cheque to:
Australian Poetry
The Wheeler Centre
176 Little Lonsdale St
Melbourne VIC 3000

All donations over $2 are tax deductible. Every contribution, no matter how small, assists us in our mission to encourage the appreciation of poetry and to celebrate the diverse poetry cultures of Australia.

Thank you.

ADELAIDE
FESTIVAL
2015

28 FEB — 5 MAR 2015

ADELAIDE

W

R

it

E

s'R

W

E

E

T

A
D
E
L
A
I
D
E
F
E
S
T
I
V
A
L
.
C
O
M
.
A
U

Government of South Australia Arts SA

PIONEER WOMEN'S MEMORIAL GARDEN
FREE ENTRY